FMR is the world’s most widely read publication on forced migration, providing a unique global forum for sharing information, experience and policy recommendations among practitioners, policymakers, researchers and displaced people.

- a full-colour magazine-style publication
- available in English, French, Spanish and Arabic
- free of charge in print and online.

FMR is the flagship publication of the Refugee Studies Centre, University of Oxford, and celebrated its 25th anniversary in November 2012.

FMR:

- facilitates debate on policy and practice, and the sharing of best practice
- supports the information needs of the international humanitarian community
- brings the reality of field experience to the attention of researchers
- presents relevant research findings in an accessible format
- provides a forum for the voices of refugees, IDPs and stateless people
- ensures that policy debates held in New York, Geneva and elsewhere are shared with practitioners, policymakers and displaced people around the world.
FMR is published by the Refugee Studies Centre at the University of Oxford. It is read in print and online by thousands of readers around the world, is written for by authors from all sectors, and is in great demand for workshops, conferences, teaching, advocacy, reference and training.

FMR brings together experience and analysis, new ideas and new perspectives, lessons and recommendations for action. It is neutral and impartial, and is committed to the rights and protection of stateless people and forced migrants of all kinds.

Each issue of FMR includes a major feature on an issue of emerging concern and/or focus – such as Climate change, Detention, and Sexual violence – and the impact of these issues on displaced people and those who work with them. FMR also covers lesser-known or little-covered themes such as Sexual orientation and gender identity, Disability, and Statelessness, and occasionally publishes issues on particular countries or regions, such as Europe, Syria, Afghanistan and North Africa. FMR presents up to 40 articles on each theme from many different perspectives, and also includes a range of ‘general articles’ on other aspects of forced migration.

FMR provides input to debates, policy development, research and conferences.

FMR is available free of charge (in print and online). For those in the Global South in particular this is enormously significant. Few can afford subscriptions to academic journals and there are very few independent publications disseminated free of charge and of relevance to such a range of audiences.

FMR’s availability in print as well as online is key to its accessibility by people around the world in contexts where internet access is still limited or expensive. In addition, the ability to raise the profile of themes covered is greatly enhanced by making print copies available at conferences and other public fora.

FMR is firmly grounded in a world-class academic institution, and yet is deeply rooted in policy and practice. The FMR Editors have many years’ experience working in the international humanitarian community, including in the field. They bring their own experience and their location within academia to bear not only in researching FMR themes and developing outreach networks but also in editing FMR articles to be accurate, useful, succinct, relevant and accessible.
The FMR team has published 52 issues of FMR plus some special issues (on Innovation, the Indian Ocean tsunami and Iraq, for example) and a number of supplements. All back issues are online at www.fmreview.org/issues

Feature themes include:
- Europe • Dayton+20 • faith • Syria • Afghanistan
- • detention • fragile states • sexual orientation and gender identity • preventing displacement • young and out of place • North Africa • technology • armed non-state actors • DRC • disability • urban displacement • protracted displacement • statelessness • climate change • Burma • humanitarian reform • southern capacity • Iraq • sexual violence • Palestinian displacement • education • trafficking • Sudan • Indian Ocean tsunami • Europe • livelihoods • reproductive health • humanitarian logistics • internal displacement • children • older displaced people • gender

Readership and Authorship

FMR is read in 165+ countries at all levels of local and international NGOs, UN agencies, Red Cross/Red Crescent societies, refugee and IDP camps, displaced people’s associations, donors, researchers and students, foreign and interior ministries, libraries, the media and members of the public. Most copies of FMR are read by multiple readers. Authors of articles in FMR are drawn from the same communities, reflecting a mix of experience, practice and research.

Profile and Outreach

FMR is widely requested, circulated and cited. For example, for FMR 51 on Destination: Europe we not only received a record number of submissions of articles but also an unusually large number of requests for print copies, including for the Greek Asylum Service. FMR 51 was warmly received, for example:

> excellent from @FMreview on the disparate manifestations of the ‘migration crisis’ - essential reading.

Demand for FMR 31 on climate change and displacement was so great that 10,000 extra copies had to be printed. This issue was noted as pioneering the coming together of climate scientists and migration researchers, and was widely requested for international climate change negotiation meetings. Our follow-up issue in 2015, FMR 49 on disasters and displacement in a changing climate, also required a higher number than normal of copies to be printed in order to meet demand.

Issue 38 on Technology brought together the perspectives on new technologies (particularly in the field of communications) of a diverse range of actors, including those who have come into the field of forced migration through the development of technologies designed for other purposes. This ability of FMR to bring together different disciplines helps promote cross-fertilisation of ideas, and strengthens understanding and learning across and between sectors.

Publishing FMR in French, Spanish and Arabic as well as English enables it to reach audiences who would otherwise have little access to material on displacement. The FMR editors liaise with readers and authors – and accept articles – in any of the four languages.

For each issue of FMR, we print and disseminate a total of about 20,000 copies of the magazine and its accompanying ‘digest’. Readers are encouraged to request the lightweight digest if they have good internet access. Although people are strongly encouraged to read FMR online, its availability in print as well as online makes it accessible in countries and contexts where internet access is limited or non-existent.

Each issue of FMR is available in all four languages websites in a number of formats: pdf, html and (for the English edition) mp3/audio.

All back issues are online at www.fmreview.org but if you would like to request print copies of any FMR issues, please email the Editors at fmr@qeh.ox.ac.uk

Each issue of FMR is promoted widely through Facebook, Twitter and other electronic dissemination channels. FMR is also available on external websites and digital storage locations throughout the world.

Want to be kept informed?

Sign up for our email alerts and we’ll let you know as soon as a new issue or future theme is announced.

Email us at fmr@qeh.ox.ac.uk or sign up online at www.fmreview.org/request/alerts

www.fmreview.org
Forced Migration Review 2016-2017

Forthcoming themes 2016-17

In 2016-17, the FMR team proposes publishing issues focusing on the following themes:

- Local communities: first and last providers of protection
- Resettlement
- Shelter
- Non-signatories to the 1951 Refugee Convention

Provisional themes for FMR beyond 2017 include:

- Latin America
- Refugee law and RSD
- Peace and transitional justice
- Water

We welcome offers of partnership and collaboration on the above, as well as suggestions of other themes. Details online at www.fmreview.org/forthcoming

PODCASTS, TWITTER, FACEBOOK, QR CODES...

All FMR articles are online in audio format in English to download or listen to online at www.fmreview.org/solutions or at iTunesU http://tinyurl.com/iTunesU-FMR.

Follow us on Twitter or Facebook - we will let you know when new issues go online and when we announce forthcoming issues. And we’d welcome your help in disseminating this information through your own networks.

The handy digest that accompanies each new issue of FMR includes a QR code for each article. New to QR codes? Download any QR code reader app (QR = Quick Response) and scan the square QR code – it will take you straight to the article online.

DONOR SUPPORT

FMR’s annual budget totals approximately £280,000 / US$408,000 / €359,000. The budget for one issue can range from £55,000 to £90,000, depending on length, demand for copies, and whether we publish it in additional (local) languages.

The Editors are seeking support for FMR in the form of:

Core/unearmarked support:
Unearmarked support is needed throughout the year to fund production of FMR issues and to cover salary and office costs. One-off or multi-year contributions of any amount are welcomed.

Issue-specific support:
If a donor is particularly interested in a forthcoming feature theme, their donation can be earmarked for (and acknowledged in) that issue. Contributions usually range from £2,000 to £40,000.

Donor visibility and reporting
All current and recent donors are acknowledged in FMR in all languages in print and online, and in the funding reports of the Refugee Studies Centre.

FMR liaises closely with donors over use of their funds and will discuss opportunities for profiling and acknowledging their support. Donors receive multiple copies of FMR for their own use, and full narrative and financial reports.

All financial transactions and accounts are approved by the University of Oxford’s Finance Department. The University of Oxford is an ‘exempt’ charity under the UK Charities Act of 1993 and as such FMR can receive charitable donations.

fmr@qeh.ox.ac.uk • skype: fmreview • +44 (0)1865 281700

IMPACT

Feedback from FMR readers indicates how they use it and how useful they find it:

“FMR is a great way of finding out more in nice bite-sized chunks!”

“... you are doing amazingly important work in a wonderfully engaging way. Your work helps me and the refugee community in an immense way, by both showing us that we are not alone in the struggle for protecting rights and in sharing with us best practices which we try and emulate.”

“Great background reading to understand the context and to design our advocacy strategy.”

“We have used the materials to train field workers on issues of migration and forced displacement.”

“I hope universities, research institutes and international organisations will index the free and indispensable FMR copies in their libraries. FMR is simply amazing.”

 “[we have used FMR] in preparing reports for tribunal hearings.”

“Ever since [writing] that article, I received comments and feedback from all corners of the world – UN, INGOs, Somali Diaspora and local people.”

“Congratulations for the best displacement-related review.”

“ Forced Migration has transformed the social and political life of the youth in this area [Guinea] [through my] understanding your magazine and implementing some factors raised in the magazine.”

“The BBC contacted me for an interview because of the article I wrote in FMR.”

“The FMR aroused my consciousness about issues relating to the reproductive health of refugees and I then decided to go to the Oru refugee camp in Ogun State to volunteer as a peer educator.”

“ Forced Migration Review is like a beacon to those working in forced migration issues.”